An investigation of energy consumption in the UK, and how we will have to change consumption in the future as North Sea oil and gas go into steep decline. The UK's problems with energy are not driven by choice, or economics, but by the effect that this collapse of domestic production is having on our economy. Ultimately there is just one option that works within the thermodynamic constraints on our future energy choices: we have to cut energy consumption by 60% to 70% in the next 40 to 60 years!
