On the border between Turkey and Bulgaria the European Return Fund is handing out a colour printed folder. The folder explains what happens at the border and what will happen to the people who cross. Europe shares its opinions about papers, money and life itself:

“In their homeland, everyone is somebody. What do you rely on here? Who are you and where are you running from? You probably think your homeland hates you. But how can we help you if you are just a shadow? And we can't know each other. You have no documents. No money.”

Like saying that people without papers, without money, can't exist. Life does not count any more.

Every third week the flights are off from Sweden. Off to Baghdad. The latest charter flight: 60 people gathered from different detention centres around sweden. First detained to make sure no one got away, while waiting for the final expulsion. How did they end up there, at the detention centres? How did they get sorted out of the mass? Through raids, passport controls. In the subway, walking the streets, at the market. Because there was nowhere else to go? One person tells how they think that all the others on the flight were drugged. After the food it all became so quiet. First the anxious crying, and then the sudden silence.

A person working at a prison explains how the people who are detained and about to be deported are forced to wear a diaper and are locked up in handcuffs when leaving.

Racism is spreading like a gas across europe. Anything is possible to do against the people who aren't counted for. In the spring of 2011 a mass grave was found by the river Evros, the east coast of greece. This was where the people who did not succeed to pass the border control unseen were buried. The CCTV stationed on the border between mexico and the united states can be followed live on the internet. Anybody can be its own border police. Australia use youtube to post films showing people being deported to scare people off from going there. The war is fully on everywhere: it makes every day, each place into a war zone for those who are not considered to belong. Europe calls the war control, the control is called security, the security is called safety.

The border is everywhere. NO PAPERS NO BORDERS NO CONTROL.

Let the no border movement destroy everything what has been recognized as normal.

Come to destroy and create
